These force fields are not visible, but we can map them by observing their effects on other objects. Force field diagrams include field lines, which show the direction of the force at a given location, and they never cross each other. The denser they are, the stronger the force field in that location. The types of field lines are:

The only force field-like advances I've seen is a system mounted on Humvees that, when fired upon by an RPG, will detonate the charge before impact. It does so by essentially randomly spamming signals around the vehicle, both radio, magnetic, etc. Although not really a "force field," I have heard about work on some invisibility stuff.
